

Problem 295E

A spherical amoeba propels itself through its liquid environment at very low Reynolds number by moving and regenerating its own surface such that the velocity of that spherical surface relative to the organism is $U^* \sin \theta$ where θ is the angle measured from the front stagnation point. At what velocity does the amoeba move through the liquid?